

MUSIC – DANCE – THEATRE – CIRCUS – STREET ARTS... PERFORMING ARTS

2008

The performing arts are less and less compartmentalised: with his Zingaro theatre company, Bartabas creates equestrian performances combining dance, music and circus; the Théâtre du Centaure stages Macbeth on horseback and the trapeze artists of the Arts Sauts troupe offer us both lyric poetry and acrobatics. And these are only a few examples of contemporary artistic productions to be found on the margins of traditional categories. Indeed, the French Ministry of Culture and Communication has chosen to fuse the different departments involved into a single one: the Department of Music, Dance, Theatre and Shows (DMDTS).

Another feature of today's performing arts is that there are increasing numbers of private classes and training programmes for artists and technicians alike—they are to be found everywhere, throughout France, and notwithstanding the uncertainty of employment prospects. This proliferation is probably due to the fact that entry into the various professions has traditionally been through apprenticeship, not only for technicians, but for performers and even administrators. And recognition through awards and competition, which are quite numerous and often international, still takes precedence over degrees, which are usually required only to teach art education in French middle and high schools - on option that foreign students are not generally interested in.

In the field of dance, the learning process begins quite early and by 18 or 20 years of age, a dancer is practically trained; only instruction in choreography and choreographic notation or further training courses are open to adults. In the case of music, participation in master classes organised in France, as elsewhere throughout the world, allow those who already have artistic experience and wish to develop professionally recognised talent to enter national music schools and conservatories; admission is always based on auditions and growing numbers of foreign students, notably Asians, are passing the competitive entrance exams for the conservatories.. For theatre, fluent French is required. The national drama schools and conservatories are public institutions and tuition is free.

MAIN UNIVERSITIES

France's State-run universities generally do not offer programmes for artists in these fields but rather, train specialists capable of analysing the different forms of artistic expression or managing the institutions which promote them.

They offer undergraduate and graduate diplomas (Bachelor, masters [ex-DESS or DEA], doctorate) and also train future teachers.
